November 15, 2017 | By Chris Economou WASHINGTON – President Donald Trump's novel approach to legislative affairs is to treat Congress as a rubber stamp for his policy preferences, leaving him free to bypass the legislative branch whenever he deems it necessary. For example, the president wanted money to fund a border wall this week, and the House of Representatives refused to provide it. Rather than accept Congress' role in initiating the flow of money to any government agency, President Trump is going to this week's State of the Union address and simply declaring the situation a national emergency. Many Democrats are joining Republicans in expressing alarm over the declaration. President Trump has now decided that the only thing standing between him and the building of a wall on the southern border is the ability of Congress to give him money. President Trump wants funding for the wall, and he is trying to have it his way. This is a new way of doing business. And it marks a dangerous turning point in our country's constitutional and political history. Getting the money for the wall was never a sure thing. Funding for such a wall was in fact a major sticking point during the most recent government shutdown. In fact, Trump's most recent standoff with congressional Democrats actually began with the president trying to use the wall money as leverage to get Congress to approve an unrelated spending bill. As a matter of both legal and political precedent, passing a budget resolution is the way to move money around in government. Such resolutions are then approved by Congress, and the money is then distributed. Funding for the border wall was included in a bill, and the president had to sign off on it by the end of last year to make sure the wall was funded at the current levels. Congress, in its wisdom, delayed that process, inserting itself as a third party in what should have been a simple up-or-down vote. If the president wanted the money for the wall, why not let Congress do its job? Simply funding the existing level of funding for the wall last year would have allowed Congress to go home, and the new Congress would have been able to take a fresh look at the f678ea9f9e
