If want to get even more advanced than than than you can record your own sounds directly into the software, but this requires an audio interface, not just your headphones. So lets see if Ezdrummer 2 really does live up to all the hype that's around it presently. Trial and error is a great way to learn to play drums and that's what this software emphasizes. As you get started you'll see that there are three main modes: Session, Performance and Drumsets. Session mode is good for playing around with different drum sounds and seeing how they sound together in a kit. Alternatively, you can start from scratch with the Performance mode which is great for learning rudiments because it automatically averages out your rudiment chops per kit part. The Drumsets mode is mainly focused on song creation although it can be used for practicing different parts of drumming too. Ezdrummer 2 allows you to build your own drum kits out of its library of sounds. There are over 1,000 great sounding samples that you can mix and match to create your dream kit. You can even load your own samples into the software for ultimate customization. There's also a lot of preset instruments that are included to get you started on any project. These include classic drums sets like Pearl, Stagg and Yamaha among others, as well as alternative percussion like Sitar, Tabla and Djembe sets. It's very easy to play around with this software using all different kinds of controllers including drum pads, keyboard controllers and MIDI guitars. The drum pads are velocity sensitive so you can get the most accurate response when hitting them. The pads are also well spaced out so it's easy to hit all the different parts of this kit with ease. The overall feel is realistic but there are some subtle differences in sound between each drum pad. Some have a very "classic" sound while others have a more modern or electronic ring to them. The instrument library is even easier to use since it's full of samples that you can easily load into the software for immediate jamming. These include acoustic drums, electronic drums, percussion instruments and even combos of these sounds if you want something exotic or unusual for your song.
